Introduction:

Research in the field of media and communication studies as well as other social science disciplines entails a diversity of methods, perspectives, techniques and frameworks. This necessitates the need to train researchers and young faculty with an interdisciplinary orientation. The question arises what is interdisciplinary orientation? Is it mere collection of diverse disciplines and people or diverse range of orientations to the same subject? These are some of the issues that the proposed workshop would address during the two weeks programme. In doing so, the idea is not to shun from the conventional disciplines. The aim rather is to inculcate interdisciplinarity to explore how the blend of multidisciplinary perspectives can offer a comprehensive understanding of the issues common across disciplines?

There is a growing demand for interdisciplinary orientation among researchers that will take them beyond the conventional disciplinary boundaries which are turning obsolete. The highly intellectual boundaries in contemporary research are no longer confined to the age old disciplinary frameworks. Interdisciplinary research in fact conduits the dynamics of the production of knowledge in interdisciplinary research cultures.
